

Dzerzhinsky on the Struggle

US.POLITSTURM.COM

I have seen and see

now that practically all workers suffer, and this suffering evokes in me a response which compels me to cast aside everything which was a hindrance to me and to fight together with the workers for their emancipation.

The society in which we live today is divided into different classes with opposed interests. The result is that happiness for one signifies misfortune for another. Take, for example, the famine which follows crop failure.

For the masses of the people this is misfortune. But there are those who utilize this misfortune in order to stuff their pockets with money (grain merchants).
